CULLOWHEE -- Large color photographs of objects once belonging to the artist's deceased loved ones will be on exhibit from Tuesday until March 7 at the Fine Art Museum at Western Carolina University.

Artist Jody Servon will speak about her work at 4 p.m. Tuesday in Room 130 of the Fine and Performing Arts Center. A reception and gallery talk will follow in the Fine Art Museum.

"Saved" comprises 40 images of objects -- each photographed on a white background -- such as a wooden shoe tree, a cast-iron skillet, the veins of a scapula and a woven dog collar.

"These stark images isolate the objects and give them an entirely different dynamic," said Martin DeWitt, director of the Fine Art Museum. "They really convey the power of the relationships Jody Servon had with each of these individuals."

Servon lives and works in Blowing Rock and Greensboro. She received her bachelor's degree in fine arts from Rutgers University and master's degree in fine arts from the University of Arizona. She is an assistant professor and director of the Catherine J. Smith Gallery at Appalachian State University in Boone.

Servon's work includes photographs, sculptures, drawings, video and installations. A previous show collected more than 120 art pieces that Servon bought on eBay for $10 or less.

She has logged solo and group exhibitions and screenings throughout the United States and Canada and has received numerous prizes, including two from the N.C. Arts Council. Her work is in collections including the Library of Congress in Washington and the Center for Creative Photography in Tucson, Ariz.

IF YOU GO

"Saved," an exhibit of photographs by Jody Servon, will be open Tuesday to March 7 at the Fine Art Museum on the campus of Western Carolina University.
